Appeal from the Industrial Commission of the State of Idaho.

Hawley Troxell, Boise, for appellant.

Monroe Law Office, Boise, for respondent.

This is an appeal from a decision of the Industrial Commission. At issue is causation between an injury on the job and symptoms that later developed during treatment for that injury. In December 2014, Steve Tenny (Tenny) sustained a right-sided lumbar disc herniation injury during the course of his employment with Loomis Armored US (Loomis), and immediately began treatment, receiving a series of steroid injections at L3-4. At some point after the second injection, Tenny began to complain of increasing left hip and groin pain, and underwent testing and treatment for these symptoms. However, the worker's compensation insurance carrier (Ace American) ultimately denied payment for treatment related to the left-sided groin pain, and when the matter was heard, the Referee recommended the Industrial Commission find that the left-sided symptoms were causally related to the December 2014 industrial accident. The Industrial Commission adopted the Referee's findings, and after Loomis and Ace American (collectively, Surety) unsuccessfully moved for reconsideration, Surety appealed to this Court.
